This motherly wore nothing on her head, although it was sacrifice to child comfort accounted for the raining and very cold; her feet were on the little woollen shawl she had worn when she ground, and the little woollen shawl pinned at her throat barely covered her shoulders.

the house. The tallow was two cents and you have the rest." " How long will this bucket of coal last?"

l inquired. "All night,"

"What will you do for to-morrow !" "God knows, for my man is out of work." "The shop's open Sundays," the dealer remarked

"That's no convenience to me, for if you offered to sell me a coal mine for a cent i walking jacket? couldn't buy it."

We surprise the merchant by asking the price of a ton of coal. He doesn't do wholesule business, he says, and we compromise n a dozen buckets.

The poor little woman lays the mutton suct on the black diamonds, takes the pail m her arms, and we go out together. She cries all the way home, the tears and rain meeting in the bollows of her pale, thin face. The annals of the poor are trite enough, hard to tell sometimes, but easily understood. Her husband is out of work, this cold weather, so favorable to trade in three, five, seven and nine, and not a whole shoe or a perfect garment between them.

'Cau't Patsy take his little brudder past ?" asked the leader of the small gang. The drudge has a face like a boxingglove, but her voice is nothing like as soft and she yells up: "No! keep out this hall. If I ketch you I'll cut your legs off."

There is no terror in the threat obviously, for a small person is seen astride the balus ter and a small voice says: " Here I come.' Crossing a courtyard we enter an even more melancholy building and go upstairs. There are plenty of half-starved, timid children about, but no scrubbing brush disturbs the surrounding grime.

On the second floor we enter a low ceilinged 100m and are at home. Everything is as dreadful as poverty can make it. There is the usual kitchen and bedroom. The place is very dark and the atmosphere overpowering. A baby sleeps in a rocking-chair. Everything else seems to be on the floor-tubs, dishes, kettles, pans, bedding and the comb and brush. The children are pretty little creatures, quiet as lambs and more than willing to be loved, but they are unwashed, un-kepmt and painfully ragged. Dick is barefooted; actually his feet are blue with cold and his little legs covered with "goose flesh." He wears a red cotton waist. One suspender holds his trousers in place, for they are neither heavy nor
